

Amy Wilcox, Administrative Officer for the Padilla Bay Foundation, is an administrative professional with more than 20 years' experience in nonprofit and governmental agencies. She earned a Bachelor of Communications from Washington State University and a Master of Science in Information Technology and Administrative Management from Central Washington University. Originally from Skagit Valley, she spent time living in Alaska and Seattle before coming home in the mid-2000s.

She has dedicated her career to promoting resource conservation, social justice, and providing access to education and the arts. She has worked in marketing, fundraising, communications and strategic planning for One Reel, a nonprofit arts organization; MoNA, a regional arts museum; North Cascades Institute, an environmental education organization based in North Cascades National Park; and Everett Community College, among others. In addition to her work with Padilla Bay Foundation she is an adjunct faculty member in the Business and Applied Technology Division at Everett Community College.

Amy has worked on a variety of diverse projects throughout her career including grant writing and management; staff development; web design and development; human resources; retail management; event production and donor relations. She currently volunteers for a variety of community organizations.

Amy lives on Fir Island, the fertile farmland tucked between the north and south forks of the Skagit River before it spills into the bay. When she is not working on causes she believes in, she can be found outdoors trail running, paddle boarding, hiking and practicing yoga. You may also find her cooking, gardening, reading or listening to music — often doing all those things in the company of beloved family and friends.
